We’re Home!

VACo has a home to call its own for the first time since the association moved its headquarters from Charlottesville to Richmond in 1985.

The renovation of 1207 East Main Street took approximately 15 months.

Our new place is about 20,000 square feet. We occupy the third and fourth floors.

There’s an elevator. There’s a kitchen. There’s a conference room big enough for any steering committee meeting.

But perhaps what makes us most proud is the fact our new home will be certified by the Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design. It is one of the greenest buildings in downtown Richmond.

Come visit us as soon as you can. We’ll be happy to show you around.

The directions and a map are on our Web site.

See you soon!
On April 8, Gov. Kaine signed into law legislation that grants every jurisdiction in Virginia the opportunity to create an Arts and Cultural District within their communities.

The law has proven to be an important economic development tool used throughout the United States. According to Del. Shannon Valentine, who patroned the legislation, “Arts and Cultural Districts have been effective in creating jobs, increasing revenue, and encouraging new capital investment, while enhancing the quality of life for all citizens.”

The law gives local government the option to provide tax incentives and regulatory flexibility to new or expanding businesses within the defined districts. It is a particularly effective revitalization tool and often used in conjunction with Historic or Main Street and Downtown Development Districts.

Mark Flynn, Director of Legal Services for the Virginia Municipal League, said, “This kind of initiative allows cities and towns to attract visitors and develop Arts and Cultural Districts more easily.”

By clustering businesses such as dance studios, museums, and performing arts centers, Arts and Cultural Districts attract more business, such as retail shops, architectural offices, and restaurants.

“Local governments owe Del. Valentine thanks for shepherding this legislation through the General Assembly,” Flynn said.

“I am so incredibly proud to be a part of this initiative which has real potential to bring more attention to the arts and act as a magnet for business and cultural development across the Commonwealth,” said Marjette Glass, director of the Lynchburg Office of Economic Development. “The Arts serve as an important economic engine for new investment.”

Jim Campbell of the Virginia Association of Counties said, “These districts provide communities an excellent opportunity to blend their homegrown cultural resources with economic development into a sense of community pride.”

With the legislation in place, all localities in Virginia will be allowed to join the nine localities presently authorized to create the districts without the need to separately approach the General Assembly for approval.
George Nester is once again a county administrator. This time he takes over in Halifax County and will begin his new post on May 18.

“Halifax County is a unique area,” Nester said. “It has made an investment to attract business and the future looks bright. Halifax County also provides a great quality of life. It is the best of both worlds. It’s very rural but at the same time, it is accessible to some urban areas.”

Nester has spent the past two years as Bedford County’s top planning official. His last day as director of community development is May 1.

“I’m a native of Bedford,” said Nester, 58. “This was a very difficult decision to leave. But the appeal to be a county administrator again, especially in a location like Halifax that has invested in technology and its future, was too much to pass up.”

Nester has vast experience in leading a locality. Prior to joining Bedford County, Nester served as Floyd County administrator from 1998-2006. He was the town manager of Vinton from 1983-1990 and city manager of Covington from 1980-83. He also served as Ashland town manager from 1977-1980.

He owned CTG&B, Inc., that provided consulting in community development, planning and grant writing services to local governments during the 1990s.

Nester has a bachelor’s in political science and government from Virginia Tech and a master’s in management from LaSalle University.

He replaces Bryan Foster, who resigned as Halifax County administrator in late 2008.

The James City County “Goes Green” Program has won the Virginia Recycling Association’s (VRA) 2009 Outstanding County Recycling Performance Award.

The County will be recognized as one of the best programs in waste reduction, recycling and litter at the VRA annual conference awards ceremony in Lynchburg, VA scheduled May 5 & 6.

The County “Goes Green” program continues to set the community standard for all individual citizens and corporate citizens. The program is recognized by the VRA for a series of initiatives and goals that have been accomplished during calendar years 2007-08.

Highlights include: Cool Counties Declaration, signed by Board of Supervisors, that pledges the County to reduce greenhouse gas emissions from County operations; County Staff Green Team, an Interdepartmental Advisory Team for Sustainable Initiatives, developed to create best practices and investment strategies to reduce climate change emissions and communicate goals and strategies to departments; Virginia Municipal League (VML) Green Government Challenge Award for local governments received in the inaugural Green Government Challenge; County Office Recycling Program recycles over 229,000 pounds of material per year, which the EPA WasteWise Program reports saves enough energy to power 50 homes for a year; and, Residential Recycling Program, a curbside program that serves approximately 21,000 homes.

The VRA conference draws state and national business leaders, industry experts, government officials and individuals committed to reduction, reuse, recycling, litter prevention and buying recycled products.

Enter the Achievement Awards Program now

Applications for the 2009 Achievement Awards Program are available now at www.vaco.org. County administrators should have also received the application form by mail.

Any county department is eligible to apply! Visit www.vaco.org for this year’s application. Award plaques will be presented at VACo’s Annual Business Meeting on Nov. 10 in Bath County.

The winning entries will be recognized on the VACo Web site and in a news release sent to statewide media outlets.

The competition is divided into five population categories so that projects compete with other localities of comparable size. There are 10 program categories. Entries must be postmarked by June 1.

The judges for the 2009 event are Katherine Hanley, secretary of the Commonwealth and former chairman of the Fairfax County Board of Supervisors; Elmer Hodge, former Roanoke County administrator; and Tedd Povar, associate director, Virginia Institute of Government.

VACo received 34 entries last year and recognized 12 winners.
VACo has joined as a partner in the Virginia Municipal League’s “Go Green Virginia” initiative, which is based upon a recognition that local governments in Virginia need to take innovative step to improve energy efficiency and promote sustainability.

The initiative has several components. Among them are two educational forums that will be held on Thursday, May 7 in Richmond and Friday, May 8 in Roanoke. Information about these forums can be found at www.vaco.org.

We encourage a representative from your county to register and attend.

Another feature of the program is a friendly competition called the “Green Government Challenge.” Information about the “Challenge” was included in a mailing sent out earlier this month by VACo to county chief administrative officers and board Chairs.

One of the mailing’s enclosures was a scorecard designed to encourage implementation of specific policies and practical actions that reduce the carbon emissions generated by the local government and the community.

To participate in the Green Government Challenge, counties need to register online at www.GoGreenVA.org. This web site is structured to make the process as easy for applicants as possible.

Certified “green governments” will be recognized during VACo’s Annual Conference between November 8 and 10 at the Homestead.

Questions about VACo’s participation in the Go Green initiative may be directed to Larry Land.

Three years ago, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine announced his administration's goal of preserving 400,000 acres of open space before the completion of his term in office. As of the end of last February, nearly 330,000 acres are preserved. He’s almost there.

In a keynote address at the start of the 20th Annual “Environment Virginia” symposium, he assured an audience of 650 that securing the final 70,000 acres should be finished with relative ease before his term ends next January.

In addition to his land conservation goals, the governor also cited accomplishments in other areas relating to natural resource protection. Among them are requirements for new state buildings to be constructed to LEED standards, the millions of dollars invested during his term to reduce nutrient loadings from wastewater treatment plants, and taking steps to better coordinate land use and transportation planning.

While much hard work has been done during his term, Gov. Kaine also acknowledged that progress is badly needed in many areas. Specifically, he said that major advancements must be made to reduce nutrient and sediment loadings into Virginia’s lakes and rivers from non point sources in rural and urban areas. Virginia will also need to concentrate on efforts to improve energy efficiency and reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

Gov. Kaine was joined by dozens of other speakers and presenters at the 2009 Environment Virginia Symposium held at the Post of the Virginia Military Institute in Lexington on March 31 through April 2.

Next year’s Environment Virginia Symposium is scheduled between April 6 and 8 at VMI.
Eighteen months ago, Peter Hill set out to answer a deceptively simple question: How did Arlington County – the smallest county in the Metropolitan Region – end up with the most Metrorail stops outside of Washington, D.C.?

That question launched a fascinating journey through 50 years of development and planning for Hill, a producer for the County’s AVN (Arlington Virginia Network) cable television station, and Mary Curtius, a former reporter who is now the County’s Media Relations Manager. The result is “Arlington’s Smart Growth Journey,” a 53-minute documentary that tells the story of how Arlington leveraged Metro to transform itself from a declining inner suburb to a national model of transit-oriented development.

“You look around Arlington – see the skyscrapers of the Metro corridors – the urban villages of Clarendon, Ballston and Shirlington, and ask yourself: was this a happy accident or did it happen by design,” Hill said. “What we learned is that Smart Growth here was the product of a community-wide effort, led by visionary officials, to remake Arlington into a County where it is possible to live, work and play without depending on a car.”

County Board members enthusiastically backed the project, believing that Arlington’s story both needed to be preserved – and told — to communities across the nation that are searching for alternatives to urban and suburban sprawl. They wanted to explain how Arlington was able to double its population while keeping traffic levels on main arteries to 1970s levels, and how the County’s two Metro corridors – 11 percent of its land – produce more than half its revenues.

Virginia Forum on Age Wave Planning

May 20
Piedmont Virginia Community College
Charlottesville

There aren't many social crises you can see bearing down on you five to 15 years before they arrive, but the age wave is one of them.

We know that the over-65 population will double in Virginia to 1.8 million citizens by 2030, and we know that Baby Boomers have very different expectations of aging than members of the Silent Generation do.

We also know that many local governments and community services organizations aren't prepared for what's coming.

Acting on the premise that being forewarned is being forearmed, the Older Dominion Partnership is partnering with other aging-related groups to host the “Virginia Forum on Age Wave Planning,” on May 20, at Piedmont Virginia Community College in Charlottesville.

The elderly have many special needs. Their transportation options are curtailed. They have complex medical issues. They often have difficulty living independently, and they suffer disproportionately from a lack of social interaction.

While the number of elderly in Virginia will swell as Baby Boomers advance in age, the number of trained caretakers will shrink as Boomers in the workforce are replaced by the smaller Generation X.

The forum is designed to educate elected officials, municipal administrators, regional planners, local foundations, United Ways, Chambers of Commerce and other leading civic groups.
The Commission on Local Government recently posted on its Web site the most recent analysis of the fiscal condition of local governments in the Commonwealth, the Report on the Comparative Revenue Capacity, Revenue Effort, and Fiscal Stress of Virginia’s Counties and Cities, 2006/2007.

The report, which has been published for the past 21 years, measures the comparative fiscal stress of any given locality through a summary statistic that combines data on the revenue capacity per capita, revenue effort, and median adjusted gross income of the state’s 134 jurisdictions.

The analysis uses local fiscal information for FY 2006/07. With respect to the state’s counties and cities overall, the localities in Southwest Virginia (Planning Districts 1, 2 and 3), Southside Virginia (PDs 13, 14 and 19) and the Southern Piedmont-Valley Industrial Zone (PDs 4, 5, 11 and 12) recorded the highest level of fiscal stress during 2006/07.

While the 17 of the 22 localities classified in the report as having “High Stress” were cities, that group also included Buchanan, Dickenson, Greensville, Dickenson, Greensville, Sussex, and Wise counties. The 23 “Low Stress” jurisdictions included the counties of Albemarle, Arlington, Bath, Clarke, Fairfax, Fauquier, Goochland, Hanover, James City, King George, Lancaster, Loudoun, Mathews, Middlesex, New Kent, Northumberland, Powhatan, Rappahannock, and Stafford.

Although some state agencies use fiscal stress or its components as one factor in grant or loan programs, those measures are one of a series of data that can be employed to analyze local fiscal condition.

One important thing to remember about the current report is that it covers a period (2006/07 Fiscal Year) before the current economic downturn.

Visit www.dhcd.virginia.gov/CommissiononLocalGovernment/PDF s07f.pdf to review the report.

The newspaper headlines and television news reporters repeat the now familiar refrain. Government at all levels--federal, state and local--are in trouble. People are losing their jobs, businesses are closing and revenue, the lifeblood of government at every level, is declining.

Counties across Virginia have been and will continue to be impacted by the fiscal earthquake that still rumbles ominously.

What can a county governing body do in response? How much will be cut from the budget? How many layoffs will be required? Will taxes and fees need to be raised?

The VACo and Virginia Tech sponsored Virginia Certified County Supervisors Program has some answers that members of county boards of supervisors might find useful.

“Funding Public Services in the 21st Century: The Role of Budgeting” is one of the five core courses featured in the Certified County Supervisor Program. It is serendipitous that this course will begin May 15 in Charlottesville and will conclude in Mr. Jefferson's fair community on June 30. The course is open to all sitting board members representing Virginia’s 95 counties. Several supervisors already enrolled in the certification program will be present. Newcomers are welcomed. The registration form for the class can be accessed by going to the VACo website and clicking on the calendar link. It is also on Page 8 of the newsletter.

The fee for the Budgeting class will be $350, which is $100 less than the last time the class was offered. The fee covers all materials as well as both sessions. Travel and transportation costs are not included. The course learning objectives center on principles of smart budgeting, accountability and budgeting for outcomes rather than costs or line items. Questions regarding this course or the certified county supervisor program can be directed to Larry Land at VACo.

March before the Committee of 100 – an influential civic organization. Many in the audience were longtime residents and civic activists, but others were relative newcomers. “What is great about this documentary,” said a three-year resident who was in the audience, “is that it gave me a context for all that I see in Arlington. It explained the community to me.”

“Arlington's Smart Growth Journey” now is airing on the County’s cable channel, and is posted on the County’s Web site at www.arlingtonva.us.

Smart Growth organizations, regional organizations and others have requested copies of the DVDs.

“The timing for this documentary could not have been better,” said Diana Sun, Arlington's Director of Communications. “We think that many communities out there that are seeking a different development model will be inspired by Arlington’s experience. ‘Arlington's Smart Growth Journey’ argues that you can practice Smart Growth principles even if you don’t have a subway by concentrating homes, offices and retail in clusters with good access to public transportation.”

The County is building a Web page around the documentary that will be up in early May. It will include extended footage from the dozens of interviews Hill and Curtius conducted with former County Board members, staffers and citizen activists and offer residents an opportunity to share their own memories in a chat forum. DVDs of the documentary will be made available to civic organizations, business groups, churches and other community groups – as well as Arlington Public Schools. County planners intend to use it when telling Arlington’s story to the many groups that now routinely tour the County to learn about Arlington’s development choices.

But Arlington sees the documentary, first and foremost, as an essential primer for current and future residents.

“Many Arlingtonians don’t know the history of the community,” said Susan Bell, Director of Community Planning, Housing and Development for the County. “That's why this project was so important. It explains that sometimes, it pays to be bold and to take political risks. Arlington has managed to grow in a sustainable way while it has preserved the single family neighborhoods that are the heart and soul of our community. This documentary explains how that happened.”

Curtius spent many hours in the County Library, tracking down the people who made the decisions in the 1950s, 60s and 70s that fundamentally changed Arlington. She cajoled many of the visionaries – many of whom are now frail and in poor health – to participate.

“These are fascinating people, who taught me that the building of the Pentagon in the 1940s changed everything for Arlington,” Curtius said. “Thousands of highly educated, often politically progressive men and women from all over the country came to Arlington to participate in the war effort. They threw themselves into improving what was then still a sleepy southern bedroom community.”

Curtius said one of her favorite moments in the documentary comes when she asks former Board Chairman Tom Richards what made the County think it could persuade commuters in the 1960s to get out of their cars and switch to public transit.

“We had just won World War II,” Richards explained. “We had beat the Japanese and the Germans. We thought we could do anything, and we did.”

What they did, Curtius noted, amounted to a revolution in Arlington.

“When Metro was being planned, other suburban communities saw it as a threat – something that would bring urban ills into their communities,” Curtius said. “But Arlington jumped on the opportunity. It fought for 11 Metro stations. It insisted that a Metro line tunnel directly under its decaying commercial corridor. And then County leaders engaged in an intensive discussion with residents – convincing them that Arlington's best hope for sustainable growth lay in allowing a huge increase in development in the Metro corridors while strengthening the single-family neighborhoods.”
